Politics, Religion, and Women's Public Vision, a project of IWPR

Since 2003, IWPR has led a research and outreach program committed to promoting a vision for U.S. policymaking rooted in women's public vision and values. The project is identifying the values that motivate and guide women's public activism around social justice issues and building stronger ties between women social justice activists, particularly in religious organizations, and the women's movement.

IWPR's research has found that religious women activists are deeply committed to a set of moral concepts that includes responsibility for the well-being of others and interconnectedness with the most disadvantaged in society.

Many political leaders recognize the need to bring moral values into public discussions of religion, morality, and politics. IWPR hopes to provide a basis for doing so that will bring a variety of women together. We are currently publishing a series of reports on women's values and experiences in religious social justice activism, the relationship of this activism to the women's movement, and strategies for encouraging women's religious and political leadership. The first of these reports, The Ties That Bind: Women's Public Vision for Politics, Religion, and Civil Society, was released in June of 2005.

IWPR has convened a Working Group on Women's Public Vision made up of women leaders in politics, religion, social justice, and feminist organizing. This group will generate concrete ways to promote women's values and vision.

IWPR's research in this area and the Working Group on Women's Public Vision are funded by the Ford Foundation. The Sister Fund has provided additional funding for outreach events for the project, including this luncheon panel.
